rugby

2006 promises to be as dramatic and exciting as ever, following the fascinating title race of 2005.

Wales will endeavour to repeat their grand slam triumph of last season and begin the defence of their title away to England, before their three home games at the impressive Millennium Stadium.

France having lost the title to Wales will once again be looking for an aggressive start to their campaign, with their first match away to Scotland before their three home games at the Stade de France.

Ireland having defeated England in 2005 and managing a respectable third position in the championship, will again be looking to improve their challenge for the title and begin the campaign at home to the "wooden spoon holders" Italy.

England having dominated the Championship for a number of years, need to improve if they are to challenge this year and begin their campaign at Twickenham (which is currently under-going redevelopment) against the 2005 champions - Wales.

Scottish rugby being at its lowest point for sometime must and surely can only improve. Their first match is at home to France at Murrayfield.

Italy will not win the championship, but they could win a couple of games. Their first match away to Ireland will be an eye opener to their standard of play this year.
